Summary

It's very rare to see the chairs of Korea's leading conglomerates get together in one place, except for when they convene for the conference of FKI, or the Federation of Korean Industries. But this week, an extraordinary gathering of such was broadcast live for anyone to see, in a parliamentary hearing to question their involvement in the recent political scandal. These leaders of the nation's largest businesses are suspected to have had a one-on-one with President Park and received special treatment, in a quid pro quo, for donating funds to two foundations supporting Park's policies.

It's not the first time that the Korean public has seen the conglomerate chairs as witnesses in a parliamentary hearing. Twenty-eight years ago, a similar hearing was held to question whether chaebols raised funds to establish a foundation to support the then president. For the past twenty-eight years, the size of the Korean economy has increased tenfold, and Korea's conglomerates have evolved into global players. But there didn't seem to be much change in the way these large businesses establish cozy ties with politicians. Politicians ask for money, and conglomerates respond and receive benefits in return.

The ongoing Choi scandal has created a long list of things that many Koreans don't want to see repeated again. High on the list is definitely a scene where the most influential chaebol leaders embarrass themselves by denying allegations raised by those angry, pretentious lawmakers.
