Summary

Former President Lee Myung-bak’s Four Major Rivers Restoration Project was surrounded by controversy even before its initiation. Supporters of the $20 billion project claimed enhanced control of floods and droughts as expected benefits, while skeptics called it an environmental disaster. After the project’s completion, related news reports continued to occasionally make it into the headlines. Coverage peaked when each of the rivers turned green due to problems with blooming algae. This week, the issue returns once again to the national spotlight, as President Moon instructs the government to launch further investigation into the project.

Supporters of Lee slam Moon’s decision as politically motivated. They say three rounds of inspections had already been conducted only to reveal minor problems. The Moon government’s true intention, they believe, is to push the former president into a corner, as a way to avenge both itself and former President Roh Moo-hyun.

While an opinion poll indicates that the majority of Koreans see no problem with launching yet another round of inspections, many experts and residents near the rivers argue that the benefits of the project have outweighed the costs. It remains to be seen whose side of the argument is right, but one thing is certain: the repercussions from the investigation will be different from those of previous inspections – the side that fails to prove the legitimacy of its actions will for sure take a heavy political blow from what will clearly be the most thorough review yet.
