Summary

When the western media covers stories related to Korea, they usually mention the “DMZ” and “Panmunjom,” the truce village where the ceasefire agreement of the Korean War was signed in 1953. Last Friday, that relic from the cold war became a place of peace when the leaders of the two Koreas met for a historic summit.

This is not the first time Koreans witnessed their leaders sitting down for a bi-lateral meeting. But this time, the hopes of the meeting were higher than before, as North Korea looked more forthcoming than in the past. The positive atmosphere of the meeting was especially noticeable when the two leaders sat down together at a table overlooking the grasslands and had a one-on-one, even without their closest confidants around them.

The agreement announced at the end of the day includes a plan to sign a peace treaty within this year to officially end the Korean War. The wording for the most imminent issue of denuclearization was a little vague, which was the cause for skepticism from the western media. As there was no concrete plan on the issue related to nuclear weapons at the summit last Friday, the media asked if nothing is resolved at the Trump-Kim summit, what will be the next step? According to the Korean media, Koreans are also aware of this situation but remain optimistic overall that the issue will be resolved in May.

If everything goes well, the definition of the Korean word Panmunjom may need to be changed. As it stands now, Panmunjom represents a worldwide feeling of war and confrontation. Soon it may be seen as a place of peace and cooperation.
