Summary

Halloween wasn't very common for most Koreans up until the early 2000s, when English teachers in Korea started celebrating the day with their students who were mostly young children. Now, it is a day to be observed by many young Koreans. During Halloween week, neighborhoods popular among young people are crowded with those wearing a variety of costumes, masks, and grotesque but sometimes playful makeup.

In a weird celebration on the day, in a nightclub in Seoul, an unknown man who called himself an "investor" made it rain 50,000 won bills to the partiers. The total amount he gave away was 100 million won. The incident, probably the culmination of all the strangest Halloween celebration stories so far in Korea, shows the strength of interest Koreans have in the day. The popularity of Halloween grows every year, so we will have to see what's in store for us next year.

Some don't understand why people are crazy about a day that has nothing to do with any Korean traditions. There are also those who say they feel uncomfortable about the day's scary costumes. But for many young people who think there's nothing fun about Korea's traditional holidays, Halloween is a chance to have fun and let off some steam. They say we don't have to be so prudish about celebrating a holiday.

Trick or treating and Jack-O'-lanterns filled with candy haven't become a part of the Korean culture yet, but Halloween has taken the centerstage of the festivities young people enjoy in the fall season.
