Summary

Last year, an interesting news report caught the public's eye. Based on research by US economics professors, the report said that the amount of money that couples spend on a wedding ceremony is inversely associated with the duration of the marriage. Weddings that cost less than $1,000 showed a significant decrease in the likelihood of divorce, while weddings costing more than $20,000 increased the likelihood of divorce by 60%. The research added, "The wedding industry has grown substantially throughout the 20th century in part due to the rise of consumerism and industry efforts to commodify love and romance."

The wedding industry landscape has not been so different in Korea, but there are certain changes now. More young couples choose to have a small wedding, instead of following the standard Korean wedding ceremony. What matters the most to them is to have their own unforgettable moment in an intimate setting, rather than to look their best in front of their friends and relatives in a large ballroom. Some have weddings in open-air venues in museums. Auditoriums in government buildings are also used to conduct weddings.

It's a matter of a personal choice. Spending money for a nice wedding is not necessarily a bad idea. You may believe that you should look your best on that special day and the guests should be given the highest quality of service. In that case, a lavish wedding is worth the price. But, many newlyweds in Korea are making more practical decisions and reducing the cost of weddings.

Different people have different definitions about weddings. For some, it is one of the most meaningful moments in their lives, and for others, weddings are a way to display a family's social status. But one thing can be said safely: what matters the most is not how well you look on your wedding day but how well your life after the ceremony goes.
