Summary

Even for those who are not so crazy about soccer, the name Lionel Messi and Cristiano Ronaldo are all too familiar. That's why many Korean soccer fans were thrilled at the news that Cristiano Ronaldo and his team Juventus would visit Korea to have a friendly match with K-League all-stars last July. But the fanatic anticipation and love for the soccer superstar suddenly turned into disappointment and anger in less than two hours.

Thefasta, the agency that arranged the match, said before the game that Ronaldo was contracted to play on the field at least for 45 minutes, but he sat out the whole game on the bench even without stepping foot on the turf. Disappointed fans in the stadium chanted his name and later the name of his rival Messi. Some even left the stadium in the middle of the match. Juventus later clarified that Ronaldo had muscle fatigue from the previous game and had to stay off the field following the team doctor's advice. But this angered the fans. British newspaper, The Guardian's Headline read, "Ronaldo's 90 minutes on the bench in Seoul was another own goal in Asia."

No athlete should be forced to play when they are hurt, and the team has a duty to protect its players. Ronaldo understandably has the right to make whatever necessary decision for his physical condition. But what's disappointing for Korean soccer fans was the way he acted. He didn't make any sincere apology about "not playing" and also cancelled the autograph session. Regardless of his behavior, Ronaldo will continue to be the world's top soccer player, but it's also true that he left a bad taste in many Korean soccer fans' mouths.
