Summary

From 1986 to 1991, there were ten rape and murder cases in the Hawseong area, commonly known as the Hwaseong serial killing case. The biggest cold case in Korea's crime history, which was portrayed in the 2003 movie "Memories of Murder" by director Bong Joon Ho, is about to be closed.

Through a DNA test, an inmate serving life imprisonment was identified as the suspect. He is now in prison for raping and killing his sister-in-law back in 1994. Considering the accuracy of the method of DNA analysis, at least scientifically, Korea's worst serial killer who was believed to be on the loose has been caught. In a month's time since identification, he confessed to all of his crimes, including five unsolved murders.

As the suspect was identified thanks to recent technological advancements, now the public hopes that other unsolved cases can be resolved, most notably the 1991's mass murder of five elementary school students who were missing and found dead in Daegu.

People say that crime doesn't pay and there's no such thing as a perfect crime. The Hwaseong case seems to reiterate this simple fact. Now many Koreans hope that justice is served and closure is provided for the victims' family.
