Paul's Summary (transcribed)

Publicly broadcasted TV channels are for everybody. That's why the rating system of major TV stations has to be a little conservative. Controversies over the properness of TV content have been around for a long time. However, we see a lot of cases where the sexually suggestive content of TV programs has run amok.

Major TV stations in Korea have K-pop ranking shows to be aired on weekends. As the Korean pop music scene is dominated by teenager girl groups, the stage is often taken up by attractive women. But the costumes and the dance moves of these young entertainers are very inappropriate. Last week, the inappropriate and even sexually suggestive dance moves of the girl groups in these shows became big issues. Finally, major broadcasting companies have decided girl groups are banned if they continue to show sexually suggestive dance moves on stage. Given the fact that the main audience of these shows is made up of teenagers, it is not educational for teenagers to be exposed to shows that are inappropriate even to the point of being risqué.

The problem doesn't stop in the music scene. For the past decade, there have been criticisms for the inappropriate content of Korean soap operas that have extreme settings and plots. The only reason these types of dramas continue to be put on the air is because their ratings are so high.

The airwaves used by TV stations are part of our national assets. Freedom of speech should be respected, but public broadcasted channels should never be the place for inappropriate content. It should be the stage for everyone and should contain proper material accordingly.
