With over 16 million readers the online serial novel "Dogani" or "The Crucible" has become one of Korea's most talked about books. Popular author Gong Ji-young had published her story in 2008 where a new teacher, at a school for hearing impaired children, uncovers a trail of sexual abuse. What has shocked readers and the public is that the novel was based on real-life events of an actual school in Gwangju from 2000 to 2004. The powerful and gripping novel has now been adapted into a film and recently released to the public. One of the hopes for the film's release is that it will raise awareness of the incident and of the disabled in general.

In a recent press conference, it was revealed that some of the cast and crew had been hesitate to go ahead with the movie due to the terrible and cruel nature of the true story. However, it was agreed that Gong Ji-young's story and the victims had the right to be heard. One of the controversial parts of the true story was that even after the teachers and principal were caught, and their horrible crimes brought to light, there was a cover-up to keep it a low-profile incident. An even bigger slap to the face to the victims was light sentence of less than one year jail-time or probation for the faculty that sexually abused children for years. The teachers were even allowed to come back to work at the school. It's hoped that the popularity of "The Crucible" and the release of the film will finally give a voice to those who had none.
