Q: Why are there so many events and anniversaries for couples in Korea?

A:

1. Dating culture varies from country to country. You can simply think that those events and anniversaries are a Korean way of being in a relationship. I know that some people go too far with these event preparations and may make some people cringe. But most couples simply have fun through these special occasions and know how to balance it. Most Koreans are not so picky about these events and anniversaries as most foreigners might think.

2. I think many Koreans go overboard with these events and don't hesitate to do something really corny. My question is, "How long can such relationship last?" Do they really think they can maintain this type of relationship in such a way forever? What is their definition of a healthy relationship? What I'm looking for in a relationship is the feeling of being settled and being supported. True relationships don't require such showy events. Celebrating Valentine's Day, one anniversary and birthdays together would be enough.

3. Don't you expect love and happiness from a relationship? Caring for each other and confirming each other's love is very important. I don't think there's anything wrong about having as many special occasions as possible. No relationship will last if couples do not put in the work to maintain it. You need to make efforts constantly to make it last. You will create great memories, and those efforts will go a very long way.
