Why do Koreans believe your blood type determines your personality?

1.

Many people say the blood type personality theory is unscientific, but from my own experience, I think the theory is quite correct. Most of type O's around me are lively and have leadership qualities while type A's are a bit reserved. I know many type B's who are a little irresponsible and selfish, and type AB's are creative but sometimes unpredictable. Instead of dismissing the theory as unscientific, I hope people continue doing some deeper research to prove the theory has some merits.

2.

The theory was first created by the Japanese, and it was adopted by Korea. I think Japan and Korea are the only two countries in the world that trust this unique theory. Regardless of whether the theory is scientifically based or not, how can you divide all the different personalities of billions of people around the world into just four categories? No human being can or should be understood in such a simplistic manner.

3.

Most Koreans don't take the theory so seriously, but they just talk about it for fun. I don't either dismiss or worship the theory. Also, I think the theory can have some positive effect on your relationship with other people. If you try to be more aware of the strengths and weaknesses of people around you, don't you think you can become more understanding? The theory isn't about pre-determination. Depending on how you accept it, the theory can help you develop a better relationship with other people.
